The Coronavirus Collective

You May Clap But We are Soon Forgotten

Aayushi Pandya MBBS
Academic Foundation Y2, Brighton, UK

You may clap, but we are forgotten.

Health Secretary, Matt Hancock, has stated that people from Black, Asian or Minority Ethnic (BAME) backgrounds are “disproportionately” dying with coronavirus [1]. The National Health Service (NHS), an organization of extremely diverse staff members, echoes this claim [2, 3]. Where 21% NHS staff are BAME, 63% healthcare workers who have died were BAME; where 44% doctors are BAME, 95% doctors who have died were BAME [4].

Due to emerging evidence, NHS England advised trusts to perform updated risk assessments on BAME staff [5], but nearly 40% BAME doctors had not received these when Public Health England’s report emerged last week [6]. Not only are we left with little to alleviate our concerns, but there are simply no solutions once assessed [2], rendering this a purely tick-box exercise.

My personal experience of this risk assessment was just this, through no fault of the individual, department or trust.

1. Do you feel more at risk given the evidence about BAME individuals being more at risk for Covid-19? I was not sure how to answer a question where the answer was already present.
2. Has emerging evidence about BAME risk increased your anxiety or led to other mental health concerns? Surely the question is flawed in itself? Like many of my colleagues, I said no; we’re all just as anxious. A solid, politically correct, ‘we’re all in it together’, response.
3. Do you feel more likely to do things you would otherwise be uncomfortable in doing because of your BAME background? Rephrased – are you less likely to say no to doing things at work? Here, I was quick to claim that if this was the case, it would be because of my ‘personality’. Thus, I disregarded the cultural elements of our personalities and that as immigrants or children of immigrants, we will always hesitate to say no and avoid doing so. This quality translates to all aspects of life, this nature to please at the expense of yourself.

Ultimately, coronavirus thrive on inequalities [8], which include: socio-economic backgrounds, crowded living, increased genetic predisposition to chronic health conditions [1, 9], and subconsciously chosen ‘key worker’ professions in the BAME community, likely based on immigration rules that on UK arrival, you offer a ‘service’. But let us examine the greatest inequality, where BAME individuals are so conditioned to put themselves second just to be seen as ‘the same’, in a society which perpetuates this.

Of course, we cannot shield 40% doctors, 20% nurses [10] and all other BAME key workers. However, recommendations could be offered? Or failing that, surely BAME workers should have had a risk assessment by now, carried out by a fellow BAME individual? It is criminal to rob so many colleagues of a forum to express their thoughts and fears, with someone in a similar position. When we make up so much of the key worker body, NHS and otherwise, please do not forget us. We never wanted your claps; we just wanted equality.

Conflict of Interest Declaration
None

How to cite: Pandya A. (2020) The Coronavirus Collective: You may clap but we are soon forgotten. Sushruta J Health Policy & Opin 13(3); epub 18.07.2020 https://doi.org/10.38192/13.3.10

sushrutajnl.net
References

